If You Feel Like Quitting, Read This First

By Kyle Winkler

Author & Bible Teacher

Sometimes nothing feels more right than quitting.

When energy is gone, motivation is low and everything feels heavier than it should, walking away can seem like wisdom.

"Maybe this is God telling me to stop."

I've thought that more times than I can count.

But I've learned the hard way that exhaustion distorts perspective.

Some of my strongest urges to quit didn't come during failure but during depletion.

After long seasons of giving, stretching and carrying responsibility, my mind started rewriting the story.

What once felt meaningful suddenly felt pointless. What once felt hopeful felt naïve.

The work hadn't changed. I had.

Your body and soul have limits. When those limits are reached, everything starts sounding urgent and final.

That's why emotions fueled by fatigue, discouragement or fear shouldn't be your decision-makers.

They're signals, not verdicts.

A signal to rest before you decide.

A signal to refuel before you retire.

A signal to step back before you walk away.

I've noticed that when I sleep, eat, unplug or simply tell someone the truth about how tired I am, clarity returns.

So if exhaustion has you wanting to give up today—on a relationship, a job or a dream—don't shame yourself for the feeling. But don't automatically follow it either.

Rest first. Decide later.

You may discover that what felt like an ending was actually an invitation to restore your strength and keep going.
